Nos. 11 AND 12 and attached railings, Royal Naval Hospital, Haslar

II

Pair of houses for officers at naval hospital. 1756, built by John Turner; extended C19. Red brick with paler rubbed brick heads and stone dressings, brick ridge stacks and slate roof. Mid Georgian style Double-depth plan. Each of 3 storeys; 3-window range, with 2-window S extension. A symmetrical pair with plat band, brick cornice and parapet, outer doorways covered by C20 timber porches with panelled sides, side windows and half-glazed doors; rubbed brick flat arches to 6/6-pane sashes, 3/6-panes on the second floor. An original lead hopper and downpipe. A rendered matching extension to the S has the ground floor removed to form a garage. INTERIOR not inspected. Subsidiary features: Attached cast-iron railings between the two porches. HISTORY: Housed the Physician-in-Charge and the Steward, and a pair with the opposite terrace Nos 13 and 14 (qv). Part of the original layout of the hospital, which was also built by Turner, a carpenter from Portsmouth dockyard. Haslar was the first large hospital built by the navy, mostly for convalescent seamen, and the medical officers' houses form an important element within this outstanding and remarkably complete complex.
